
Ink placed deeper in the dermis presents a heavier pigment burden and requires significantly more clearance work than superficially deposited pigment.

Archaeological excavation requires heavy machinery and incredible patience.