

Macrophages consume pigment, eventually die, and release their contents for new macrophages to pick up in slightly different positions.

The longest relay race in history always ends in a smudge.