

Anodisation alters the thickness of the transparent oxide layer to produce a spectrum of colours without using pigment.

The master painter retired his brushes, utterly defeated by the optical physics of the metal.