

The passivation layer of steel degrades in the low-oxygen and chloride-rich environment of a healing wound.

Sweat remains the ultimate enemy of ordinary metal.